“The London Review of Books . . . seems to me much the best left-wing journal of the period”

Peregrine Worsthorne in the *Spectator

So even in the enclaves of the New Right, the message about the London Review of Books is getting through! “It’s not just about books, it’s about politics . . . a very good arena” – was the way a BBC commentator put it recently. In fact, of course, the LRB is about politics because it’s about books. And if, to readers on the Right, we seem left-wing, then that’s probably because we take books and the debates that arise out of them seriously at a time when the dominant political culture is anti-intellectual and barren of real ideas.

The political range of the LRB is wide: Douglas Hurd on Tory achievements as well as Tam Dalyell on Tory misrule – Sir Ian Gilmour on the Middle East and James Prior on Crichton Down as well as Bryan Gould on Labour policy and Peter Shore on Gaitskell – Paul Foot in praise of Stalker, Gabrielle Cox (Chair of the Greater Manchester Police Authority) cutting him down to size, R.W. Johnson on Spycatcher, J.K. Galbraith on Truman, E.P. Thompson on the jury system under attack, Michael Howard on the Korean War, Edward Said on Central America. . .

“The London Review of Books is the liveliest literary magazine in the country” Salman Rushdie

. . . LRB’s political subject matter is as varied as its treatment is deep. And so is our coverage of fiction and poetry, philosophy and the social sciences, history and art history. In all these areas LRB has the reputation and authority to command the best writers currently working on the international scene. The roll call is impressive: Martin Amis, A.J. Ayer, Julian Barnes, Alan Bennett, William Boyd, Angela Carter, Nadine Gordimer, Tony Harrison, Seamus Heaney, Patricia Highsmith, Ted Hughes, Michael Ignatieff, Kazuo Ishiguro, Ryszard Kapuscinski, V.G. Kiernan, Hanif Kureishi, Emmanuel LeRoy Ladurie, Jonathan Raban, Christopher Ricks, Richard Rorty, Philip Roth, Susan Sontag, Bernard Williams.

With writers like these the success of the London Review of Books has been assured. Meanwhile, the serious periodical press in Britain has gone into decline. Established titles move down-market, or to the Right, or merge or disappear. But the London Review of Books goes on growing . . . and growing . . . and growing. In the last three years it has more than doubled its circulation and is now established as Britain’s leading literary paper in 80 countries around the world.

Readers from all quarters are migrating to the LRB. You should join them . . . if you haven’t already.
