Cultural Studies: History and Theory

Part-time from September 1991
Full-time from September 1992

The end of History? or New Beginnings?

Traditional ideas of history are being challenged - from political theorists who herald the end of history, and from cultural thinkers who embrace the postmodern world. In a broad survey of contemporary cultural theory the course explores what possibilities exist today for thinking historically.

DIPLOMA IN ADULT EDUCATION

The University of Nottingham

For people engaged in education or training work with adults.
Two years part-time or one year full-time - stay on and also take:

M. Ed in CONTINUING EDUCATION

Both courses are based on Paulo Freire's educational approach. This means a thematic curriculum arising out of the learning group - the chance to relate local issues to global themes - transformed teacher/student relations - a transformed relation to knowledge - and most important, the development of critical and creative thought.

Why not join us for one or both of these EDUCATIONAL EXPERIENCES with a real DIFFERENCE?

For further details contact:

THE UNIVERSITY OF LEEDS

MA IN DEVELOPMENT STUDIES

This MA programme offered by the Centre for Development Studies has inputs from the various social science disciplines as well as from other faculties. It is conceived as an alternative to programmes which turn out narrow specialists unaware of the broader context of development, or, conversely, produce generalists lacking any concrete skills or area of specialised knowledge.

It is built around an interdisciplinary core course covering theory, strategy and issues in development. Students also take two of a wide range of specialist options in such areas as rural development; women and development; project appraisal; business, state and world economy, and development economics, as well as others in geography, education or health administration. Finally, an area of particular concern is explored in depth in a dissertation.

The course is designed for graduates in the social sciences, but practical experience of problems of developing countries is also taken into consideration. It provides an opportunity for those active in the field to upgrade their skills and consolidate their knowledge, as well as a chance for those with a strong interest in the subject area to deepen their understanding of development issues.

For more information apply to: Dr C Bayliss, Director, Centre for Development Studies, University of Leeds, Leeds LS2 9JT, UK

MA IN THE POLITICS OF INTERNATIONAL RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

This MA programme offered by the Department of Politics provides an opportunity for detailed analysis of recent dramatic changes in the international political economy and their implications for development, and in turn relates these to key social and political features of developing countries. It thus links the fields of international politics and political economy of development.

It focuses on resource allocation; the relationship between state and economy; the role of multinational corporations and international agencies; and questions of food security and sustainable development.

It is suitable for students seeking training from a political perspective in development theory and policy or for those working in ministries or NGO's requiring further expertise in the management of state and business relations or in handling resource, environmental or food security policy.

For more information apply to: Dr R Bash, Department of Politics, University of Leeds, Leeds LS2 9JT, UK

A limited number of grants and scholarships, which either fully or partially offset the cost of academic fees, are offered by the University of Leeds to overseas students on a competitive basis.

freeing the politics

The story so far . . .

- November 1988 The Communist Party launches its mould-breaking Manifesto for New Times.
- 1989 Popular revolutions in Eastern Europe shake the world and liberate millions.
- November 1989 The special congress opts decisively for a radical transformation of the Communist Party: To recast it to reflect the new politics for New Times and to explore new associational initiatives.
- March 1991 The Communist Party Executive Committee issues the new draft constitution. With dramatic departures from both bolshevism and British Labourism throughout its aims, values and organisational forms, it explores a new empowering politics. Yet it takes forward the best of the party's tradition of commitment to popular struggle, alliances and analysis.
- November 1991 The Special Congress meets to amend, agree and launch the new party. This transformation is challenging and radical, and yet it is only the first steps in an uncertain process. You can help shape it.

. . . help shape the future
